X-ray halos created by scattering in interstellar dust are a unique way to measure the size distribution of large grains, where the majority of the mass in dust is found. This is particularly useful since X-ray observations can be done for dust in relatively dense molecular clouds, unlike optical/UV observations. Chandra and XMM/Newton observations have already begun to give results useful for dust modeling, and recent results have been very promising for the future.